Liam Morrissey was commissioned into the Canadian Forces in 1987. He served as a combat arms officer and held command and staff roles of increasing responsibility releasing early as a Major. He entered the private security sector in support of resources companies in conflict areas in West and Central Africa creating security programs, and resolving instances of employee kidnap, extortion and in extremis evacuation.

Appointed Head of Risk Management and Security in the international division of Tesco plc in 2000, Liam managed the business through a series of sustained IED campaigns in Northern Ireland and Asia. He adapted security processes across Tesco's Asia, Central Europe and Middle East interests. He led international investigations into malicious product tamper and contamination, working transnationally in cooperation with law enforcement agencies, food producers and supply chain organisations. He also successfully managed the effects of protection rackets, cargo hijackings, sectarian violence, employee murder and kidnap situations. He went on to develop country evacuation and other crisis response programs for all 14 Tesco operating countries.

Upon leaving Tesco in 2005, Liam formed a security risk consulting practice that was sold to an AIM listed professional services company in 2006. Liam led the development of this business from a standing start to a $10M international investigations and security consultancy working directly to counter specialty risk threats to commercial interests around the world. He reformed the business offshore in 2011 as MS Risk Limited. The practice is established as insured advisors to Lloyd's of London insurance syndicates covering specialty risk perils: extortion, malicious product tamper, illegal detention, kidnap for ransom and hijacking. Case work has occurred around the world, notably including Afghanistan, Libya, Iraq, Somalia, Mali, Burkina Faso, Nigeria, the Philippine's, as well as within Latin America and Europe. The firm also supports law enforcement and military interests.
